

Domestic Violence and Disabilities

Adults who live with disabilities are at higher risk of being a victim of violence than people who do not live with disabilities. The same holds true for children with disabilities. The higher risk of violence stems from issues such as stigma, discrimination, and physical defenselessness as well as a lack of social support for their caregivers or partners. Financial problems and the stress of little to no respite may make the situation ripe for abuse. The World Health Organization reports that disabled children are almost four times more likely to experience violence than children who do not have disabilities. They also report that adults with disabilities are 1.5 times more likely to experience violence than those without a disability.

Women with a disability are more likely to experience violence or abuse compared to women without a disability. Some studies show that women with a disability may be more likely to experience violence or abuse by a current or former partner compared to women without disabilities. Abuse may come from partners or spouses as well as personal care assistants or paid caregivers.

Domestic violence and abuse can take many forms including sexual abuse, emotional abuse, and physical abuse. Other types of abuse may be more subtle such as withholding needed care, medicine or assistive technology, isolating a person from family and friends, and not allowing a person to control their finances. Men are also victims of domestic violence and should know there is assistance regardless of gender.

If you are being abused, call 911 if you are in immediate danger. If you are not in immediate danger but still need more help to get out of a relationship that is harmful to you, call the National Domestic Violence Hotline at 800-799-7233. If you live in a nursing home or other institution, you can get help from the state or regional long-term care ombudsman. If you live in your own home, you may want to contact the Adult Protective Services office in your state—they are there to help protect the elderly and people living with disabilities.

When you call for help, you may want to use a computer or phone outside of your home so your calls and emails can't be traced. Try to get in touch with family members or friends who may be able to help you. You may need to look into finding an accessible shelter or getting a restraining order. Your safety plan should be one that minimizes the danger of leaving the person who is being abusive.

DRW is working with the Wisconsin Coalition Against Domestic Violence and Wisconsin Coalition Against Sexual Assault to address domestic and sexual violence against women with disabilities and Deaf/deaf women. Activities and efforts have relied on two primary strategies: elevating collaboration within pilot communities among sexual assault, domestic violence and disability programs; and enhancing the community's capacity to serve women victims with disabilities and Deaf women in a manner that is accessible, supportive and culturwally affirmative.
